WHEN SHERMAN GOES.

Oh, hoary Sherman, at whose name
All lesser villains bow in shame,
To me, asleep, but yesternight
There came a solemn, awful light,
Which broke, as through its radiance stole

A vision of thy tortured soul.
It was a dream to give affright,
And still I shudder as I write.

John Sherman died; his conscience,
sore

With guilty deeds of many year,
With selling country for red gold,
With crimes whose half we never told,

Hied straight to Peter at the gate,
And, numb with guilt, sought entrance straight.

But Peter, potent in his way,
Waved that dark soul away, away.

Then Sherman sought the gate of hell.

The demons joined in direful yell,
Which through the gloomy portals
rung,

Till Night and Chaos, too, gave tongue.

Again he knocked, and Satan said:
"Seek other place to lay your head, For hell must self-respect maintain."
And Sherman sought the night again.

Decried in heaven, adjured in hell,
Earth gladdened at his funeral knell,

He sought the realm of traitor souls
Who, shuddering, flit where chaos rolls.

But Traitor Arnold, shrinking, fled, And Burr drew back his scornful
head,

And Monster Jeffries shrank away,
Though loath to go, ashamed to stay.

But one there was took Sherman's hand

To greet him in that nether land,
And said: "I meet you as a brother—
One soul alone and ne'er another—And mid the gloom of crimes that were,

Where placeless demons flit and whirr.

Alone mid Chaos' nameless snares,
Judas and Sherman 'hunt in pairs.'
* * * * *

'Twas but a dream. But, Sherman, see!

The hand of Fate still beckons thee:
Your country and your God you've sold;

You've bartered fame for British gold;

You've dealt with knaves, and, sooth
to tell,

We know you learned their lessons well.

Your time draws on; death's monster yawn;

And earth will laugh when you are gone.—Stockton Mail.

A Reno printer, in every sense a philanthropist, except in the possession of money to make his philanthropy practical, has evolved a novel scheme to lessen the enormity of the dram shop habit, while increasing the consumption of liquor. His scheme is known as the rebate saloon. In the resort all drinks are to be sold at 10 cents. On every drink taken the customer is credited by an expert accountant with one cent. Twice a year a dividend is declared by the saloon. The projector of the rebate saloon scheme thinks that it will become so popular in a few months that all the expert accountants, thrown out of employment by the collapsing of banks throughout the country, will be at work again, commanding handsome salaries in saloons.

Dare Congress repeal the Sherman law or suspend the clause providing for the purchase of silver? We once saw a carpenter working upon a rickety scaffold high on the side of a building. So poorly was the scaffold constructed that he concluded to tear it down and to build another and stronger one in its place. But he did not commence to knocking it to pieces from where he stood? No, he didn't want to tumble that way, so he simply built a stronger scaffold before he tore the other down.—Salt Lake Mining Journal.
